In the 2020s, a significant cultural upheaval occurred with the implementation of the Ahriman Great Social Reset, which systematically targeted and suppressed abstract doodle art, labeling it as "Degenerate Art."

This movement was spearheaded by the influential figure Ahriman, who harbored a fervent desire to eradicate the burgeoning avant-garde doodle art movement.

His followers fervently echoed his sentiments, denouncing modernism, abstraction, and non-representational art, exemplified by the works of the artist known as Emil, who was often perceived as a troubling figure, potentially suffering from severe mental health issues or substance dependence. They argued that such collective doodles were emblematic of a morally decayed society, a decay they attributed to the technological dependencies of an older generation, which they claimed stemmed from genetic inferiority and political subversion.

This narrative was further fueled by the activities of the so-called Jesuits of Truth, a group of outlaws who dedicated themselves to disseminating uncomfortable truths that Ahriman's supporters contended were devoid of any redeeming social value.

They accused these truth-tellers of intentionally seeking to disrupt the fabric of polite society, revealing truths that many would have preferred to remain hidden, thereby amplifying the tensions within a society grappling with its own moral and artistic identity.

In the latter part of the 2020s, a notable shift in the oversight of artistic expression emerged, particularly concerning artists such as Emil, who found themselves under the vigilant scrutiny of agents affiliated with Ahriman's WEF Goonies Administration.

This oversight was exemplified by the actions of Commissar Harris and her proficient aide, Comrade Waltz, who took the extraordinary step of dispatching agents from their Committee for Social Peace and Harmony (CSPH) to conduct unannounced inspections at Emil's studio, which was uniquely situated in the back booth of the KitKat Gentleman Lounge and Laundromat.

These agents were tasked with the peculiar responsibility of physically assessing the state of Emil's artistic tools, checking the moisture of his paintbrushes and the availability of colored pens. Furthermore, the Committee's agents escalated their surveillance tactics by randomly stopping Emil and other recognized artists on the streets, probing them for the possession of drawing pencils and unused art paper, thereby creating an atmosphere of pervasive control over the creative community.

This invasive approach not only highlighted the extent of governmental oversight but also raised significant questions about the implications for artistic freedom and the broader cultural landscape during this tumultuous period. In a bold act of rebellion against the imposed restrictions, Emil clandestinely created an impressive collection of more than 13,000 small doodles, each a testament to his creativity and defiance. He meticulously concealed these artistic expressions within steamer trunks, which he subsequently buried in his backyard, a hidden sanctuary for his thoughts and ideas. Alongside these doodles, he also buried various electronic devices and components of prohibited technology, resolutely refusing to surrender them to the military faction known as the Antifa Militia Volunteers, a group associated with the WEF Goonies' enforcement arm.

artists who emerged during a tumultuous period marked by significant challenges to free expression.

This era, reminiscent of the oppressive climate of the mid-1930s, saw many creative minds grappling with the constraints imposed by societal expectations and the pervasive culture of self-censorship. Among these artists, Mister Emil, the resident artist at the Lone Palm Ferry Casino, stands out as an almost solitary figure, courageously voicing his dissent against the prevailing norms of the
